

BRADFORD HILL MEDAL NOMINATION

For Award in 2024

The Bradford Hill Medal is awarded to a Fellow for outstanding or influential contributions to the development, application, or exposition of medical statistics.

Criteria

Nominees for the Bradford Hill Medal are expected to have contributed in at least two of the areas of development, application, and exposition of medical statistics.

- Development and methodology: There is no requirement that nominees shall have published their contributions in the journals of the Society, and excellent contributions may well have been published almost exclusively in journals such as Biometrika, Biometrics and Statistics in Medicine.
- Application: Many medical statisticians work as part of an inter-disciplinary team. Increasingly such work leads to publications in medical journals with the statistician as senior author. Many of these papers have profound public-health implications (for example, cancer and nuclear installations, oral contraceptive use and breast cancer, cardiovascular risk factors, AIDS, organ transplantation). Consequently, these include some of the applications where fellows of the Society have their greatest influence on society.
- Exposition: Exposition of good statistical practice, together with clear and comprehensible criticism of bad practice, is an important role for the medical statistician. This can be discharged in several ways, including expository articles in medical journals and refereeing and editing of the medical, as well as statistical, literature. In a community where originality is often the most admired quality it is all too easy to undervalue exposition.
